

This gorgeous flower greeted me early one Monday morning. God gives us amazing beauty, if we look for it!

Something that I frequently see here, but do not understand is pairs of shoes hanging on overhead lines. Could be electric or telephone lines, but this was taken here in Santa Fe.

A veggie stand set out in one of the little parks in Santa Fe.

And here is a fruit stand in the center of San Pedro.

Day of the Bible here is September 24th. Colegio Episcopal Santa Cruz headed out into the streets around Santa Fe, with different ages going to different sections. Here is one of my neighbors pausing in her play in the shade to watch the parade.

Our church headed into the streets for the day of the Bible as well and here are some of the children with their signs. They tell us to: Read the Bible. Practice the word of God. Your Word is a light to my feet and lights my path.

Our truck decorated with bible verses full of our musicians and speakers takes the lead in our parade for the Bible.

We have a new group of Daughters of the King and this is from their installation by Bishop Holguin.

Staying at the seminary this summer gave me the opportunity to get to know some of the folks finishing up their theses. Attending their graduation was a pleasure, as here the new graduates are giving a plaque of recognition to Rev. Ashton Brooks.

Our recent group of confirmands are formally and publicly committing themselves to Christ.

This group of students is working on the review for the final exam.

Some of my students are trying to remember the names of muscles responsible for certain actions while enjoying themselves.

September 8th is World Physical Therapy Day and while it wasn't all I'd hoped for, a group of students at least made these polo shirts with the World Congress of Physical Therapy logo for the day, which were purchased by a few folks. Hopefully next year something more can come together.
